NAPOLEON AND WIELAND.

IN the autumn of 1808, some of the princes, then assembled at the congress of Erfurt, came for a few days to visit the court of Weimar, and, among them, Napoleon.—He was accompanied by a troop of French players, who borrowed the theatre, and on the 6th October exhibited in it Voltaire's Death of Caesar. Wieland went to see this tragedy, in which Talma was to perform, and sat as usual in a private side box of the second tier, reserved for the ducal family, to which he had been attached as preceptor. Napoleon observed him there, and inquired who was the venerable old man with the black velvet calotte: this was the usual costume of Wieland, who not liking to wear a wig, and being exposed by the baldness of his crown to colds of the head, had adopted a circular cap resembling that of the catholic priests. After having been informed by the prince primate that this was Wieland, Napoleon signified a wish to see him after the play; and Wieland, accordingly, was ushered to the ball-room which was to be the next place of rendezvous. In one of Wieland's letters the following account is given of the interview.

"I had not been many minutes there before Napoleon came across the room towards us; the dutchess then presented me to him regularly, and he addressed me affably, with some words of compliment, looking me steadily in the eye. Few mortals have appeared to me so rapidly to see through a man at a glance: he instantly perceived that, notwithstanding my celebrity, I was a plain unassuming old man; and, as he seemed desirious for ever making a good impression upon me, he at once assumed the form best adapted to attain his end. I never saw a man in appearence calmer, plainer, milder, or more unassuming. No trace about him of the consciousness that he was a great monarch. He talked to me like an old aquaintance with his equal; and, what was very rare with him, chatted with me, exclusvely, an entire hour and half, to the great surprise of all present. At length, about midnight, I began to feel inconvenience from standing so long, and took the liberty of requesting his majesty's permission to withdraw. 'Allez donc,' said he, in a very friendly tone, 'bon soir.'

"The more remarkable traits of interview were these:—The previous play having drawn our conversation upon Julius Caesar, Napoleon observed, 'that he was one of the greatest characters in universal history; and indeed,' added he, 'would have been, without exception, the greatest, but for one blunder.' I was about to inquire to what anecdote he alluded, when he seemed to read the question in my eye, and continued: 'Caesar knew the men who wanted to get rid of him, and he ought to have been rid of them first.' If Napoleon could have read all that passed in my inner mind, he would have perceived me saying—Such a blunder will never be laid to your charge.

"From Caesar our conversation turned to the Romans; he praised warmly their military and political system. The Greeks on the contrary, seemed to stand low in his opinion. 'The eternal scuffle between their little republics was not formed (he said,) to evolve any thing great. But the Romans were always intent on grand purposes, and thus created the mighty Colossus which bestrode the world. I pleaded for the art and literature of the Greeks; he treated both with contempt, and said, they only served to dispute about.' He preferred Ossian to Homer. In poetry, he professed to value only the sublime and energetic, and pathetic writers, especially the tragic poets; but of Ariosto, he spoke in some such terms as cardinal Hippolito of Este did; not aware, however, I think, that in this he was giving me a box on the ear. For any thing humorous, he seemed to have no liking; and, notwithstanding the flattering friendliness of his apparent manner, he repeatedly struck me as if cast from bronze.

"At length, however, he had put me so much at my ease, that I asked him how it came about that the public worship, which he had reformed in France, had not been rendered more philosophic and more on a par with the spirit of the times. 'My dear Wieland, (he replied,) worship is not made for philosophers; they neither believe me nor my priesthood. As for those who do believe, you cannot give them, or leave them, wonders enow. If I had to make a religion for philosophers, it should be just the reverse.' In this tone the conversation went on for some time, and Bonaparte professed so much scepticism, as to question whether Jesus Christ had ever existed. This (adds Wieland,) is very quotidian scepticism; and in his free-thinking I saw nothing to admire, but the openness with which he exposed it."

Bonaparte sent shortly afterwards to Wieland a brevet of admission into his legion of honour.

From a late London Paper.

The following has been sent to us as an extract of a letter from Count Rastopchin, to one of his friends at London:—"I was much surprised at seeing in Bonaparte's appeal to the British, nation, that he had incurred danger in wishing to save Moscow from the conflagration in the year 1812.—His amazing efforts and greatness of mind were however, limited to mounting his horse as soon as the fire appeared, and galloping to the distance of two English miles from the town, in order to place himself in safety. He passed three days and three nights in a palace in the midst of a corps of troops, who bivouacked, and only returned to Moscow on the fourth day, when the conflagration had ceased, after having consumed 7,632 houses. I was well informed of all that was passing in the town by means of six officers disguised, who remained undiscovered during the whole of Bonaparte's stay at Moscow; but on his quitting it, he set fire to the palace of the Kremlin, among others, and to the castle of Petrousky, which had served him as an asylum during the great conflagration. Perhaps this was done by him as an act of kindness, with the intention of purifying them by fire from the evils he had been the source of. From the tone of this appeal it would seem, that he dictated it at the moment when his mind was guided by the same feelings as during his passage to the island of St. Helena in 1815; and he appears unwilling to forget the style of his bulletins, which serves as a proof that habit it is a second nature.

The following remarks are from the History of French Factions, a work recently published by Mons. Lavellee. After tracing the various changes and revolutions of parties to the time of the concentration of power in Bonaparte, he says—"I have still to paint the faction of one man against Europe, and of Europe against one man. Human enmities from this time, assume a character of grandeur till now unknown.—We shall no more witness the ignoble contests of a Robespierre, or of a Marat.—Their scaffolds are too narrow for the number of victims; Death requires plains and provinces for its theatre and its voracity demands whole nations. The ambition of a single man is about to sacrifice whole nations en masse, and henceforth infants in their cradles will be marked with these words—FOR BATTLE & FOR DEATH. "Ambition was always the van-guard of Bonaparte's thoughts—he mingled it with every thing, even with his misfortunes.—The most celebrated conquerors, the most famous devastators of the world, were contented with one fall; he required two.—Not choosing to resemble any one he began his catastrophe over again, in order that he might finish it in his own way. One day I saw him examining the crowns of some ancient rulers. He took the crown of Attila, and placed it on his head.—"How! his head bigger than mine! I could not have believed it."—he said harshly, but with a smile; the smile was a bitter one."

It is remarked by the reviewers, that Bonaparte is an obvious favorite with Mons. Lavallee

A private letter from Cadiz, of the 28th March, states, that a regiment of Lancers, and the regiment of Navarre, forming part of the force destined to act against the Patriots of South America, broke out into open mutiny on the 25th and bid defiance to the controul of their officers. They cried out they would not go out to act as butchers to the Cadiz monopolists; swore they would liberate all confined in the prisons. and themselves obtain their arrears of pay out of the Treasury. The other quiet regiments were marched against them, and after a severe contest they were compelled to embark on the following day. During the whole time the greatest alarm prevailed in Cadiz; the windows and doors of every house were shut up. A postscript of the same letter adds that the contest was renewed on board, when a great number of men were shot, whose numbers, as well as 300 who had previously deserted, were replaced by part of the Cadiz garrison.

From the London Sun, April 16.

SPORTING.—On Thursday afternoon, Mr. John Gould, from Hinfield, Sussex, decided a bet at Brighton, of two to one, on each shot, that he would fire at 20 halfpence flung into the air, and plant shots every time. Mr. Gould fired from a double-barrelled fowling-piece. He threw each halfpenny to a considerable height, and after taking his aim, his shots told 18 times out of 20. He only missed the 10th and 12 shot. Some of the pieces of money had six shots, and one was struck on both sides as it twirled in the air.

The "Columbian press."

The Journeymen Printers of the city of New-York, understanding that Mr. Geo. Clymer is about to leave this country for Europe, with a model of his newly invented Printing Press, held a meeting last evening, and unanimously passed the following, among other resolutions:

"Resolved, as the sense of this meeting, that we highly approve of the improvements made in Printing Presses, by Mr. George Clymer, of Philadelphia, and that we consider them as superior to every other description of Presses now in use in the United States.'

In addition to the above resolution, it gives us pleasure to state, that having in use one of the above Presses, we can add our own conviction of their great superiority, in every point of view, over any other Printing Presses that we have ever seen, and we recommend them to every Printer in the United States who regards ease and economy in labour, as well as durability.

(Daily Adver.

Steam Printing Engine—We have seen further accounts of the new printing engine introduced into England. It is wrought by steam, and with the aid of two or three boys, can perfect nearly a thousand sheets per hour. A comparison is made between the costs of Presswork, with the old and new press—and the result is, that "three boys in one hour, at a cost of 6d sterling, are enabled by this new application of steam to perform the labor of two men for 8 hours, at a cost of eight shillings. Such are the present capabilities of the engine; but there is no limit to its required power, and the size of the form is no obstacle to its perfect performance. it is propose to take impressions on double demy, in which case three boys at 6d will in one hour perform the labour of twenty-two men at sixteen shillings. In its general analogy, this press is not unlike the roing press of copper plate printers." [Norfolk Herald.

HONOUR.

Honour is the stamp of truth affixed by the seal of justice—and when impressed upon the heart of man, it forms a character more glorious than if possessed of Indies or imperial diadems. 'Tis honour that gives greatness to the statesman, renown to the warrior, and fame to the Philosopher: without the inestimable treasure of a good name they stand detested in the eyes of the world as prominent instances of human depravity. Honour is the noblest attribute of our nature: 'tis the imperishable treasure which constitutes the riches of the poor man, and the brightest ornament in the wreath that decks the brow of him who is blest by the auspicious smiles of fortune. 'Tis honour, and honour alone, that elevates a man above his species, and forms him truly great.—Happy is he within whose bosom throbs the rich possession of unsullied honour.—Fenced in the mantle of conscious integrity he calmly smiles at the taunts and pitiful the malice of an envious world.

PITTSBURGH.

FRIDAY, JUNE 6, 1817.

Steam Boat Constitution.—The account published in our paper of the 30th ult. respecting the unfortunate accident on board the steam boat Constitution is confirmed. A letter from a gentleman who was on board the boat a few hours after the melancholy occurrence, to his friend in this city, gives the following particulars.

"At Point Coupee, we found the Constitution, she having bursted her boilers and killed eleven of her crew and passengers. The day before, the Washington had left Natchez, at 3 P. M. The Constitution about an hour and a half after, and passed captain S. of the Washington, that night, at losing some of the buckets of her water wheels, they stopped to replace them, which gave the Washington an advantage. The Constitution after repairing her wheels soon overtook the Washington, and passed her again as was observed by the people on shore, it being then daylight. The Constitution's wheels giving out again, they stopt and the Washington passed her once more. During all this time the steam was constantly encreasing. The engineer had lain down, and knowing that the steam had not been let off, and that it was encreasing to a great height, he sprang up to let it off, but before he was able to effect it, the ends of the boilers next to the forward cabin blew out, and swept every thing before it clear forward to the stem. The passengers had just sat down to breakfast, and the captain and his wife, were on the upper deck about to go down. The steam from the boilers was so powerful, that it instantaneously swept every thing that came in its way, first the thin bulk head, tables, chairs, dishes, passengers and lockers, and carried them with such force as not only to scald, but break both men and things in a shocking manner, producing a scene too horrible to relate to a feeling mind. This circumstance will have a tendency to prejudice those unacquainted with the particulars against steam boats in general; but it ought only to be attributed to consummate folly and negligence."

The following persons were chosen officers of the company for erecting a bridge over the Monongahela river, opposite Pittsburgh, at the election held the 2d instant.

From some parts of Delaware we learn that the wheat and corn are experiencing the same fate from the fly and grub-worm, as they have in Maryland and Virginia.

The United States Navy Board have advertised to receive proposals for supplying the materials for three Steam Batteries, each to be equal to a 120 horse power.

Monument to Washington.—The legislature of Virginia have appointed commissioners in every county of the state, for the purpose of obtaining subscriptions to raise a superb monument to their departed fellow citizen and patriot, the illustrious Washington.

Domestic Manufactures.—A Connecticut paper states, that, of the house of Representatives now in session, one hundred and sixty members are clad in American, and thirty-eight in foreign cloth.

We are informed (says the Lexington Reporter) by a gentleman from Nashville, that a soldier of the U. S. army, named Wm. L. Simmons, was killed by a citizen whom he attempted to horsewhip in the street. A communication in a Nashville paper of the 19th inst. mentions the death of the soldier, and says he fell by the "ruthless hand of violence," but does not give any statement of particulars to justify the remark.

M Locatelli, mathematician, of Milan, has invented a machine for propelling even ships of war against the current. A horse power is sufficient to put the machine in motion.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE REPORTER,

New Orleans May 8th, 1817.

Yesterday sailed on a cruise the Mexican Government schooner Harry Hotspur, bearing the flag of commodore Kappe, and commanded by him in person, formerly of the U. States Navy, with a most gallant crew of one hundred and sixty Mexicans. We all consider the Harry Hotspur, with the active intrepedity of the commodore, equal to any thirty-two gnn ship in the service of old Spain.

MEADVILLE, May 30.

Tuesday last, came on the trial of George Speth Vanholland, charged with the murder of Hugh Fitzpatrick, late of Bloomfield township, Crawford county in February last, and continued until Wednesday evening, when the jury retired, and after an hours' absence, returned with a verdict—"Guilty of murder in the first degree."

On the part of the commonwealth, the evidence was full, clear and conclusive. It exhibited a history of crime and brutal wickedness, we almost venture to say unexampled in the annals of criminal jurisprudence. On the part of the accussed no testimony was offered.

Thursday morning he was again brought to the bar of the court to receive the awful sentence of death. He appeared much dejected. To the question put to him by the court—Whether he had any thing to say why sentence of death should not pass upon him? he rose on his feet, and in a faultering voice replied, "I can't say anything—I'm unwell."

The president of the court then addressed him as follows.

George Speth Vanholland,

You have been convicted of the highest crime against the laws of nature.—In your trial, we believe, that you have been deprived of no legal right or privilege to which you were justly entitled; and when the circumstances are considered, under which the fact charged against you, was perpetrated; that in the house where you had been kindly received and hospitably entertained, at the dead hour of the night—when sleep had rendered the family defenceless. You rose and maliciously and cruelly slew your benefactor!—Who can doubt of your guilt—or of the justice of that verdict which has been pronounced against you?

The safety of society imperiously demands, that you should be cut off as a dangerous member. You have no reason to expect a pardon from the governor. You ought then earnestly to endeavor to be prepared for that event, which you can now have no rational hope of escaping, and devoutly to apply to HIM, who alone can fully pardon, purify and fit you for happiness in that state of being, into which, beyond the grave you soon must inevitably enter.

The last sad duty of this court remains—that we pronounce the sentence which the law has appropriated to the crime of murder in the first degree, of which we are convinced that you have been justly convicted. That sentence which this court now adjudges and awards, is, That you be taken from hence to the gaol of the county of Crawford, and from thence to the place of public execution, and that you be there hanged by the neck until you are dead.

DIRECTORY OF FASHION.

1. Wear your hair very thick; especially if it be gracefully straight, like a bunch of candles—and more particularly, avoid cutting it as the warm weather approaches, as nothing is, at present, more unfashionable among the beaux, than the appearance of comfort. As a hat is a very useless thing, especially in bright and warm sunshine, the less the brim, the more reasonable:—Wear one, therefore, with about the same proportion of brim as that sometimes seen on the outside of a half bushel measure; the effect of this, upon an overgrown crop of hair, is indescribably graceful; and can be compared to nothing but a half peck measure, inverted on the top of a hay cock.

2. Wear a surtout, with about as much fine cloth at the bottom of it, over and above what is comfortable and becoming, as would make a holiday suit for a boy of ten years old. Do not forget, however, to have it open before, lest you might be mistaken, at a little distance, for a lady in a pelise. The advantages of this dress are manifold: it may occupy the attention of a cross dog, who would otherwise make free with your heel, or the calf of your leg—it will keep your shoes, or the feet of your boots clear of dust—it will flap away the musketoes, in the dog days—and above all it will help the market for domestic manufactures (provided you have it made of such materials, which I am afraid is not quite the fashion.) Now there are some cavillers who will say that if you would appropriate the cloth to the back of a poor boy, it would be an act of————what is it?————O, I recollect————an act of benevolence? (I think there is such a word in our language) that it would rather add than take away your comfort, or the gracefulness of your appearance; and that it would equally promote the interest of our manufactures. But then, it would not be in the fashion; and all other considerations are trifles in comparison with this.

Eastern Argus.

Singular Escape—On Saturday last, an infant, but 2 or 3 years old, unperceived by its family, got out of the suttie or dormant window of a two story house in Cherry street, and crawled down the roof of the back gutter. In this perilous situation the child was discovered by a man in Water-street, and the alarm given to its affrighted parents, who remained in an agony of suspense for some time, until, by the activity of a cabinet-maker, at work in an adjoining yard, the little adventurer was reached and handed into the garret window in safety. *N.
